Summary Risk IndicatorOVERVIEW

During the month of March, equity markets experienced sharp declines, driven by signs of a slowdown in the US economy and rising uncertainty stemming from the policies of the new US administration, particularly the implementation of import tariffs. Indeed, the slowing economic trend in the United States—reflected in falling consumer and business confidence—also highlights growing mistrust regarding the potential impacts of Trump’s policies (immigration, deregulation, efficiency of the public sector, fiscal policy, and tariffs). In March, the noise around these issues intensified, particularly with the introduction of tariffs on the automotive, steel, and aluminium sectors, as well as the announcement that reciprocal tariffs (against all trade partners) would be introduced in early April.

This development will influence the Federal Reserve, as, despite a healthy labour market and inflation remaining at uncomfortable levels, the imposition of tariffs will negatively affect consumption (since the cost of tariffs will ultimately be borne by the American consumer) and economic growth, while simultaneously pushing up prices. In this context, as Jerome Powell mentioned in the March meeting, the Fed will need to “wait and see” the real effects of these policies—severely limiting its ability to act, as it will have little room in the short term to cut interest rates to support growth.

Amid this backdrop, with sharp declines in US equity markets (S&P 500 -5.8%, Nasdaq -8.2%) in March, US Treasury yields fell only marginally, but the dollar weakened against most currencies. In some ways, the events of this first quarter and the movements in financial markets are starting to challenge the prevailing consensus of American exceptionalism.

In Europe, the economic situation remains fragile. Despite a modest recovery, uncertainty over the impact of tariffs continues to weigh on economic outlooks. However, the withdrawal of US support for Ukraine and the mounting pressure on NATO allies have led the European Union to announce a “mini bazooka” defence spending programme (around €800 billion over four years). In Germany, the new Chancellor unveiled an infrastructure and defence investment package that could exceed €1 trillion over the next 10 years.

Although there are few details on these programmes, this shift within the European Union—under Germany’s leadership—has had a material impact, supporting the outlook for economic recovery and driving up long-term government bond yields and the euro’s appreciation against other currencies. European equity markets posted losses (SX5E -3.9%), penalised by the spectre of rising US tariffs and the deterioration in global growth expectations. Following the Lunar New Year, economic activity in China has continued to improve. Chinese authorities reiterated their intention to support the economy and facilitate the restructuring of the real estate sector, announcing an increase in the central government deficit for this year (from 3% to 4% of GDP), along with increased infrastructure investment and new consumption stimulus measures. Chinese equity markets rose moderately in March, led by the technology sector.

The performance of the Haitong Aggressive Fund was naturally impacted by this environment, falling 4.64% in March, penalised by the decline in equity markets and its exposure to consumer discretionary, technology, and utilities sectors.

Following the outperformance of the technology sector in China, we further reduced exposure to the MSCI China ETF, increasing the weight in the CSI300 China ETF—more exposed to the domestic economy and consumption—by approximately 2.5%.

The portfolio positioning continues to reflect our preference for European assets (and, to a much lesser extent, Chinese equities), now supported by a stronger commitment from European authorities, both in terms of fiscal stimulus and monetary policy. Nevertheless, in the short term, the direction of financial markets will continue to be dictated by the policies of the new US administration—particularly trade policy—which remains a key risk for both US and global economic growth.
